

I want to teach my friends about misinformation because many people in my life believe things too fast. Sometimes they see a post online and they think it is true right away. I think it is important to show them that reading slowly is very useful. When we read fast we miss important details and we start to think wrong things. I want to explain that even a small mistake in a photo or in text can change the whole meaning. Many people do not check who wrote the message and why they did it. I think asking why this person posted it is a big step. Also I want my friends to understand that old news can look like new. I saw many times when a very old story becomes popular again and people think it just happened. These things make confusion and stress. I think if I teach them to ask simple questions and to think slowly they will stay more safe. And also we will stop many problems in our community because less people will share wrong stories. I feel this is something we all can learn even if we are not experts.
